Forward

The Florida State University has had saltwater flowing through its veins since establishing the Oceanographic Institute in 1949, the year the Florida Women's College became the co-ed university that we know today. The Oceanographic Institute started on 25 acres on the harbor side of the peninsula that forms Alligator Harbor, about 45 miles south of Tallahassee.

The university until 1954 maintained two other field stations, including one at Mayport on the St. Johns River near Jacksonville, and one on Mullet Key at the mouth of Tampa Bay. The Mayport Station focused on menhaden and shrimp fisheries and oceanographic problems associated with the Gulf Stream and the mouth of the St. John's River. Not surprisingly, the Tampa Station focused on red tide.

In 1966, the Oceanographic Institute closed when FSU formed the Department of Oceanography on the main campus. By 1968, a new facility sprang up across the harbor and further to the west on land donated to Florida State University by Ed Ball. A brief history of the laboratory appears on the FSUCML website here: <https://marinelab.fsu.edu/aboutus/history> and a more in depth one appears here <https://marinelab.fsu.edu/aboutus/documents/evolutionFSUCML.pdf> in an article published by Dr. Michael Greenberg (Director 1978-1980), Dr. William F. Herrnkind (Director 1980-1985), and Dr. Felicia C. Coleman (Director 2006 - 2020) in Gulf of Mexico Science.

This document contains a list of all the publications that we could find that used one of the FSU's marine stations as a research site or conducted research with the technical or scientific support of personnel on staff at those stations. It is a living document that the FSUCML has been piecing together from current and past students, faculty, and other scientists affiliated with either the Florida State University Oceanographic Institute, the Florida State University Coastal and Marine Laboratory (formerly the FSU Marine Lab) or both.

If you know of other publications that should be added to the list, please do not hesitate to send them to the laboratory at fsucml@fsu.edu
